Dear Friends,

It’s February, the month of presidents and love, two words that are historically not often used in the same sentence however, I'll refrain from political commenting. I’d much prefer to talk about love! Ben Franklin was quoted; “Those who love deeply never grow old; they may die of old age, but they die young”. I’m a fan of Ben Franklin, he had love of life that encompassed a range of interests but if I were to get into Ben’s head I’m betting he was commenting on romantic love or more appropriately, his love for women. As a great supporter of romantic love I place no judgment on Ben for his reputation but right now I'm much more interested in his love of life. His deep curiosity about the world around him is evident in his writings and countless titles; author, printer, political theorist, politician, postmaster, scientist, musician, inventor, satirist, civic activist, statesman, diplomat and in his later years, abolitionist. He had a deep love of life. For some the fear of pain and failure often restricts our participation in life. Our own thoughts impede us placing perceived barriers in our path to engage in experiences we love. When we love deeply, whether it’s the people in our lives or the love for life’s experiences and the knowledge that surrounds us, we become richer. I encourage you to find something you love and give yourself to it. We are not all Ben Franklin but we are uniquely ourselves and worthy of a rich and full life.

Kathy
